October Commentary

Your Fund returned +2.2% during the month compared to +2.3% for the MSCI World Index (NR) GBP.

It is a curious fact that amidst all the excitement about AI and the strength of the US stock market, US software companies have made less than half the return of the US market so far this year. The cause for this is partly cyclical as the sector consolidates the big gains it made last year. But there are also questions about growth, competition and the implications of generative AI ('Gen AI') for incumbent software providers.

Few companies illustrate these dynamics better than Adobe, a company owned by the Strategy since 2022. Last year the shares were +67% (in GBP). This year they are down -21%. Adobe faces intensifying competition from newer web-based rivals at a time when Gen AI threatens to automate the work of the creative professionals that subscribe to Adobe's products. Monetisation of Adobe's own Gen AI tools is apparently slow going.

We travelled to Miami in October to attend Adobe's annual conference for creators. The event drew a crowd of 10,000 people, many of them relatively young, all of whom are deeply habituated to Adobe's various products. They and millions like them can be expected to remain loyal Adobe customers for many years to come. Nor is Adobe standing still. It is bringing more innovation to its users than ever before, and the ability to generatively add, remove and mix elements of creative work eliminates hours of manual drudgery. We believe that Gen AI will lead to a massive proliferation of content that will only enhance the value of Adobe's highly precise and commercially safe editing tools. These include Adobe's own lighter-weight web-based applications that enhance collaboration and create opportunity for Adobe to grow its audience way beyond the hardcore of creative professionals. Monetisation can wait. The company is wisely focussed on proliferating usage of these new features and apps, confident that their value will eventually be realised in volume growth, higher retention, cross-sell, and pricing.

These insights reinforce our conviction in the Strategy's investment in Adobe.
